I agree with Mr. McConachie's state. ment of weat the custom of the trade is here. On the contract in this case Measts Hewett and Co. appear on the face of it as the principals. Cross-examined-I do not act as a soler of kerosine oil. I am only the broker between the parties. I have not known of a case in which any case in which the importer ranked as purchaser, although I know it to be the custom. I do not get my brokerage on the number of cases stipulated in the contract sales, but on t quantity of oil actually delivered. In my contracts I generally stipulate that the full quantity shall be supplied in sound cases whether the ship's cargo arrives damaged or not: I do not remember having ever made a contract which did not have any reference to damaged or sound cases. Ro-examined -- Although my contracts are so worded I think that the usual rule and custom would regulate it, and not the strict wording of

On a falling market it would pay the owner to keep the buyer to his contract and on a rising market it would pay him to proportion the sound cargo among a lot of buyers. His Lordship-Does it strike you as unreasonable that the seller should be able to control the buyer's position by abstaining from subsequent sales on a falling market, and by making subbuyer should not get the full benefit of his contract P

Witness-No, it does not strike me as unfair. The buyer in a rising market would get a proportion of damaged cases. Are you of opinion that he so ild be forced to secept damaged cases ?- He could not be fore d.

So that by effecting anbacquent sales the seller might compel the buyer to take damaged cases That would affect the position of the buyer would it not?-Yes, but under the present form of contract this is avoided. You say the seller could force the buyer to take his quantity in sound and unsound cases, the latter at any price he fixed? - Yes. Mr. Ernest Goutz. sworn, said-I am employed in the firm of Arubold, Karb rg and Co. who do a very large business in verosine oil. Damaged oil merely means as a rule that the external box is slightly discoloured, or that the tin is a little rusty, but does not infer any injury to the oil itself. In a good market the buyer will take as much of the cargo, sound and damaged, as he an get, but in a bad market he would not and I should have to make a deduction on the damag d. If a purchaser tendered me the payment for 10 (kg) cases I had contracted to supply him with I should kerosine trade here. I think the details of each particular contract depend upon the various firms who import:

Mr. Robinson addressed his Lordship at length, contending that if any such onstorn prevailed as the plaintiff had maintained the aver would be in a very unfair position. He submitted that it had been shown by experts in the trade that the custom was that some! cases. out of a damaged cargo, were distributed pro rate among the buyers, the owner himself ranking as a buyer and receiving a proportionate aliare. Mr. Francis for the plaintiff contended that no definite custom of the trade had been shown to exist but that each individual fi m in the colony was accustomed to make its own special form of contract without reference to those used by others. No universal custom in the trade had been proved, but on the contrary it had been shown that each firm dealt with any difficulty as it arose. Supposing, however, for the sake ofargument, that a general custom in the trade did exist. Mr. Francis proceeded to submit that it would be repuguant to, and inconsistent with, the terms of the contract. If a buyer contracted to purchase on arrival, sar, 10,000 cases of kerosine and the seller was willing to deliver, then surely the buyer could not refuse to accept delivery because there happened to be some damaged cases among the cargo. That would be in violation of the contract. At the conclusion of the addresses of conuse! to the Court his Lordship said that he did not think he had much doubt about the case, but he
